

Attorney Variety

Attorneys are individuals who have trained in legal matters; some people refer to them as attorneys or advocates, sometimes as legal advisors. The term advocate is used when a lawyer acts on behalf of the person he is representing in a courtroom; although they are all licensed to represent parties in court, some appear in court more frequently than others. There is a slightly different set of circumstances if they provide legal counsel, when they are referred to as legal advisors; clients use them for suggestions on available courses of action relating to legal issues which affect them.

Trial lawyers have greater familiarity with courtroom rules and strategy; owing to the fast thinking that is required by those who practice this area of law, it is not for everyone. Trial lawyers actually spend more of their time outside the court; they investigate evidence and interview people involved in the case.

It is difficult to get away from the law in any of its aspects; this is why lawyers have their own set of laws they must abide, to be above reproach. Some areas of law are so highly specialized that legal representatives may never have to appear in a courtroom; although they are all licensed to represent in court when required.

There are many areas now where a lawyer can specialize. Considering the number of legal representatives there are, it is surprising just how many will never be required to attend a court of law!

It is not all glamour though as much of the work involves resolving land disputes, planning licenses and land administration; although they may also be called upon to challenge or defend other civil actions.

Attorneys are also involved with laws protecting intellectual property rights, an area much in the news of late; property like digital media, CD's, computer games and software for instance, are particularly at risk since the advent of the Internet. Legal departments within insurance companies also employ specialist lawyers; they investigate the legality of insurance transactions, writing insurance policies to conform with the law and protect companies from false claims.

Despite these different areas of legislature, most attorneys will practice in the field of either criminal or civil law; persons charged with crimes are represented by criminal attorneys on both sides one for the defense and one for the prosecution; whereas civil law deals with civil disputes, usually between two parties.

Many individuals prefer very high profile, "public interest cases" both criminal and civil; this can be where a large company or government body may be involved with actions that have affected the general public. Still other lawyers use their skills working for non-profit organizations and other charitable bodies; they help to look after the legal rights of disadvantaged and less fortunate people around the world.

About the Author

If you live in Florida and are looking for an a st. petersburg injury attorney check with Marc Nussbaum before deciding. If you need an orlando divorce attorney in Florida contact Michael Rathel.

Source: <http://articlesonlove.com>